JEFF: I mean, I just want to add, being your parents for the board simulation, what a difference. I don't know if you can all appreciate this, it's sort of hard when you're yourself to appreciate what you know now, and what you can do. It's a big difference, appreciate what you know. You treated a patient with a severe asthma exacerbation who was about to die. You did all the right things, and it only took you like 20 minutes. And I think that's pretty special, and I think you guys should be very proud of where you are.

I'm impressed. I think there's not really another time where you grow this much as like the first year of medical school. Maybe internship is the time where sort of, you're in the fire. But you know, times like this, it's an opportunity to reflect on how much you've really taken in and now you can apply. So I think you guys did an excellent job. And I think all of you were all keyed in, and I think your hushed silence was thought, and I appreciated that. And of course my pulmonary consultants did a good job too.

[LAUGHTER]

But I just want you to appreciate that it's hard to self-reflect because we're always so self-critical. But you should appreciate that you really did an excellent job, and each simulation has been sort of this very steep learning curve, and you're really functioning at a quite high level for your training.

RICHARD SCHWARTZSTEIN: I just want to pick up on one thing because I noticed this. The first simulation, there was a lot of nervous laughter, which is pretty common for early simulations. And there was very little of that this time because you were now focused, as Jeff was saying, on what was going on and how you were thinking about it, and what you to do about it. Matt?

MATT DIFRANCESCO: Not much else except to kind of echo what they said. But I will also say that, as someone who is maybe a little bit closer to training, like this scenario will come up for you guys again soon. So just take away the lessons that you learned systematically, and [INAUDIBLE]. But that there was awesome. It was awesome.

RICHARD SCHWARTZSTEIN: All right. Well thank you again for volunteering.

[APPLAUSE]

STUDENT: Yay! Good job.
